27Genetic diversity within populations of the mite Alloeogryllus bilineatus (Acari: Acaridida) based on COI and analysis of the effect of population size on genetic variation. The population genetic structure and gene flow of the mite species Alloeogryllus bilineatus was examined based on mitochondrial cytochrome oxidase subunit I (COI) sequences. Nine populations of A. bilineatus were sampled in the Korean peninsula and they covered different climatic regions ranging from a subtropical parkland to a tropical rainforest. Among the populations, a total of 96 haplotypes were found and the level of haplotype diversity (H_d) was 0.988. COI sequences were compared with those of the tick species Dermacentor marginatus as the second mite species for the purpose of confirming and estimating the genetic relationships between the two mites. The results of phylogenetic analysis showed that A. bilineatus is closely related to D. marginatus. A positive relationship was observed between population size and haplotype diversity. However, in this case, the relationship was not linear, but rather curved, suggesting that genetic drift may play a more important role than gene flow. There was no signature of population expansion in the results of neutrality tests for the COI sequences.
